Description of the Prior Art In a magnetic resonance (MR) examination of a patient, a field gradient B0 is superimposed on a static basic field B1 to be examined. The object to be examined is placed in this basic field. The basic field is achieved by the application of a constant magnetic field. As a result of the field gradient superimposed on the basic field, the atomic nuclei of the object to be examined are not aligned in an identical direction. In the absence of a field gradient, a spatially inhomogeneous basic field acts on the atomic nuclei. The influence of the field gradient on the atomic nuclei is typically a linear increase in the strength of the basic field with the coordinate. Thus, as a function of f678ea9f9e
